

The main aim of this WP is to examine how the recent migration crisis may affect the future of European integration. We propose to establish the main parameters of divergence in migration governance and to explore how these could impinge on the future course that EU integration takes with regards to the relative importance it is due to pay to secular, humanitarian, internationalist, rights- and liberties-oriented goals in comparison to religious, security-focused, exclusionary positions that are also rejectionist of multiculturalism, foreignness, and alternative lifestyles and orientations within the community. The main objectives of this WP are as follows:

- To identify the conservative and liberal course of Europeanization in the face of the recent refugee crisis and to explain the main parameters that make state (macro) and societal (meso) actors conservative and liberal Europeanizers.
- To analyse the relationship between state (macro) and public (meso) actors' stance on immigration and their positions on the future course of EU integration.
- To examine the factors and the ways through which state actors re-frame EU policies in order to change their ideological direction.

This WP will be conducted in Greece, Austria, Italy, Hungary, Germany, Sweden, Poland, and the UK.

Deliverables

- 8 country reports
- Report on the externalization of conflicting Europeanization
- Integrated report on conflicting Europe.
- Standardized dataset